They had left at the old place, how-ever, a few things, which they designed re-moving at their convenience. Among other things thus left was an old clock, an ancient spinning wheel, and some other things, whose intrinsic value was not great, but which were considered worth keeping on account of their being heir-looms in the family. These things were left as before stated, with full confidence that they would not be disturbed, the owner little thinking that evil spirits were to enter and do mischief. In this he was mistaken,
